

Disposition – Nature's way

'A Being in a moment of time'
Existence lies in change.
A process driven by time.
Flaws and virtues, prearrange.
The end is built into the beginning.

The force of life is not straightforward. It demands disorder and emerges through pandemonium. We often have the urge to clean it up and sort it out to make it more presentable. But in capturing a single moment of this disarray, the beauty of the chaos itself becomes undeniable.

Through most of my work, I try to uncover the hidden beauty behind the seemingly mundane. There are entire universes to be discovered, simply by changing perspective and scale. A simple sample of plain, brown Whiskey and Coke, placed under a microscope can reveal an image more akin to the feelings it can spark.

Art, to me, is a medium through which one can capture both feeling and physicality. A whiskey sour, under a microscope, can also be a phoenix bursting through inhibitions and constraints with confidence. One just hopes it doesn't fly too close to the sun.

The medium of our intoxication often mirrors the end result. You just need to take a closer look. From within the molecules of a drop of champagne, one can see a vibrant and striking peacock emerge, ready to take on the world.

Some forms of beauty refuse to be contained. They burst forth in explosions of brilliance and vitality, claiming their space in this chaotic world. They dare you to gaze upon them. And when you spare a moment to pay attention, it becomes impossible to look away.
